Lasting Legacy: Ensuring the Long Term Impact of Arts Education

RESEO Autumn Conference 2018

15-17 November

Copenhagen - Denmark

Creating long term community projects and partnerships through music, opera and dance education offers the potential to make real impact on many levels. But how do we plan for and ensure the legacy of these projects and what really happens when they end?

Large-scale, Europe-wide programmes such as the European Capitals of Culture initiative or the ongoing European Year of Cultural Heritage, as well as national arts initiatives, provide an opportunity for arts institutions large and small to create new connections with local communities, widen their audiences and deepen the impact of their education activities.

While raising a city's international profile is one of the potential gains of participation in this kind of project, one of the key issues is how partners can sustain the regeneration and cultural scene that such projects often inspire.

The RESEO Autumn Conference 2018 in partnership with the Royal Danish Theatre invites you to take a look at the lasting impact of arts education projects and the civic role played by arts institutions. What is legacy and what are the best practices for creating and sustaining it? How can we work with local, national and European stakeholders to ensure legacy, and what happens when priorities diverge? From a global perspective, what is the civic role of our work?

Join RESEO and Royal Danish Theatre in Copenhagen on 15-17 November 2018 for three days of discussions, debate, knowledge exchange and practical workshops that will provide arts education professionals with new tools and methodologies to ensure not only the widest possible impact of their activities, but also their long-lasting legacy.
